

Inventory of Sawmills

There is no simple means of creating an inventory of sawmills. There are several problems.

What is a sawmill? There are lists of sawmill proprietors and of timber merchants. A number of businesses operated as both sawmillers - cutting timber from raw logs into lengths and sizes suitable for building purposes - and timber merchants - retailing them to the end user.

The sawmiller who located the sawmill close to the timber would often operate a business as a timber merchant in a major town or towns. Some of these merchants also had sawmills at their Brisbane yards; some did not. Where no description of the premises is available, it is hard to distinguish between timber yard and sawmill. Some sawmillers operated as timber at substantial distances from their principal mills, e.g. in Rockhampton, Mackay, Townsville and Cooktown.

Making the distinction is made more difficult by the major sources of lists, the published trade directories. Many sawmillers were also merchants and listed as such. A merchant, not wanting to be missed by customers, could contrive to be included as a sawmiller. A business listed only as a timber merchant could, in practice, be a sawmill as well. Listings and advertisements for larger businesses were not always clear as to which locations were merely timber yards and which were sawmills.

In the early years, when operating a sawmill required a steam boiler and steam engine (ignoring the few cases of water operated mills), a sawmill was a major undertaking and sawmilling was an investment of some substance. Even with the availability of portable steam boilers, a sawmill was still a significant investment, but it could be moved cheaply. These were particularly popular in forest country west of the Great Divide where it was cheaper to move the mill than haul logs more than a few miles as the local resource was cut out. The spread of reliable and compact internal combustion engines, and later the distribution of electricity, further reduced the capital investment needed. Used plants were often available for relocation.

It has not been possible to type sawmills, such as hardwood, softwood or case mill. Some large mills had both hard and soft wood mills set up separately. Smaller mills often cut one or the other but would change if the supply of timber changed or cut out. Others changed saw blades and settings as often as circumstances dictated the need. The distinction between case mills and other mills is likewise not always a clear one.

The lists I have created are based only on entries under the heading 'sawmills'. The limitations of these lists, however, needs to be remembered. Although I have combed many other sources, many entries in the inventory are based solely on directory information.

The dates of operation are also difficult to determine from lists of sawmills. Directories like Pugh's Almanac and the Queensland Post Office Directory, the main Queensland-wide directories, were generally published annually. The process of revision was, however, less than complete.

It is obvious that the publishers had to rely on local agents. They gathered information and updated it. There was also direct contact with the businesses themselves. There was a strong tendency for information to be repeated from year to year unless information arrived to the contrary to indicate the need for change. At other times, a business could be omitted by failing to respond indicating it was still in business. After the advent of saw mill registration in 1936, and the subsequent use of official information, it remains a question as to how the information was used. It is obvious that the 1941 Post Office Directory was substantially revised with many sawmills in the 1940 list no longer present and an even greater number of new entries. From 1945 the list states it was based on official sources, but that may have been true earlier but not stated. After 1947 there was a list in 1949 and then no more.

A particular problem with the Post Office Directory is deciding when individuals listed as sawmillers are operating separate businesses or are partners in a single operation. In towns or localities with multiple sawmills it is often difficult to determine whether the ownership of a mill has changed as distinct from one mill closing and another one opening. Consequently the inventory may list more mills than existed in a place, and in other cases may place together proprietors with the same surname who operated separate mills. Sawmills listed with several owners may be in fact multiple sawmills. Other sawmills with non-overlapping date ranges (and some with overlapping date ranges) may be multiple entries for the same mill.

In the period after World War II, there was a huge growth in building, a large amount of retirement and an even greater number of new entrants to the field. The number of small and portable or semi-portable units grew rapidly.

Surprisingly, at first glance, there was a significant problem in under-reporting of sawmills in the early years. The first sawmills, being major investments, received considerable attention in the local press. Quickly, however, numbers of sawmills grew and began to be located close to the resource. These mills could often be overlooked in the trade directories which concentrated on major centres. Remote mills could become notorious after boiler explosions, but otherwise may have been constructed, exploited the timber supplies, and closed, without being recorded in any list.

The existence of the same information in Pugh's Almanac and the Post Office Directory and possibly other sources, is not to be regarded as independent confirmation. In some places, at least, the same person may have supplied the information to both directories. These would probably be common, rather than isolated occurrences.

This report was also based extensively on regional histories. Many of these do not provide references, and often provide unique access to oral sources many of whom are no longer alive. Others, however, have used the trade directories, or a combination of both, without any clear indication this is so. Consequently, a close correspondence between information from local histories and the directories can not be treated as independent confirmation.

The places at which sawmills are recorded can be misleading. Postal addresses may be given, or the place listed under the nearest major town. In more remote areas the distance between town and mill may be substantial. Sometimes a mill can be listed in more than one place, or its location change from year to year. It is not clear whether the mill has been relocated - as happened quite frequently - or whether simply the way of recording it has changed.

The lists here are based on the Brisbane and Country directory listings of Pugh's Almanac from the 1870s to 1897 (plus 1902) and on the list of trades and professions in the Post Office Directory from 1892 (the first list of trades which covered country areas) until its demise. An examination of the trades and professions list for Pugh's Almanac revealed many inconsistencies between it and the town listings.

Given the large number of sawmills which once existed and have now closed, it is obviously impossible to pinpoint the location of more than a minority, even using the combined resources of the written record, maps, global-positioning-satellite instruments and oral sources. Establishing an inventory needs to be regarded as an ongoing accumulation of information and the gradual improvement of its reliability.

For many mills I have listed their position in degrees and minutes (often to one-tenth of a minute or about 200 metres precision) but these positions needed to be treated with caution.

Where the position is listed as found by GPS the position should be accurate to about 100 metres or 0.05 minutes, but the mill may still have been misidentified.

Where, instead of GPS, the source is shown as 'map1m', the source is a military map of scale 1 inch to 1 mile. The position is that of the town or township - meaning its railway station or siding or business centre - as the position of the sawmill is not known. Where 'saw1m' is shown, the location is that of a sawmill as shown on the map but the identity of the mill is often not known. In many cases where a sawmill is shown, there were several sawmills in the locality and the same coordinates have been used for each sawmill which could be the one shown on the map. Where 'map50' or 'saw50' appear, the coordinates are based on 1:50,000 metric maps.

For the final report, GPS positions will be inserted wherever possible, but it is inevitable that the positions of the bulk of sawmills in the inventory will not be accurately known.

In this provisional list, sawmills have been sorted, first by local authority, then by Forest District within local authority, then by place and finally by name of the first proprietor.

Sawmills Inventory Listing

The listing is divided into Forestry Districts in alphabetical order:

Beerburrum
Dalby
Imbil
Maryborough
Monto
Yarraman

Within each Forestry District, the sawmills are listed alphabetically by local authority within the forestry district. Within each sawmill the sawmills are listed alphabetically by place.

The following list lists the forestry districts for each local authority:

Brisbane - Beerburrum
Beaudesert - Beerburrum
Biggenden - Maryborough

Warwick - Beerburrum, Dalby
Wondai - Monto, Yarraman
Woocoo - Maryborough

Sawmills have been listed alphabetically by place within each local authority area. For each place, all the known sawmills have been listed, alphabetically by proprietor. In many cases there is uncertainty as to whether different proprietors were owners of the same mill at a given place or different mills as the information is not available. For each mill the first known year of operation is given followed by the last known date. As detailed listings could not be obtained post 1949 there are few last dates shown as post 1949.

The latitude and longitude are provided for each mill. Where a GPS reading is available, this is usually accurate to within 100 or 200 metres. Other mills are identified as "saw.." or "map.." where "saw" means a sawmill was marked on the map at this locality and "map" simply means the position given is that of the central point of that locality. The ".." indicate the type of map, "1m" for 1 inch: 1 mile military map, "50" for 1:50,000 topographical map.
